The Benefit

Studies have consistently shown that there are many and various benefits of exercise, from reducing risk of diabetes to improving brain health to extending your lifespan. Most of these studies also cite that the exercise does not have to be intense. About 30 minutes a day seems to be most quoted as reducing risk of chronic diseases and maintaining good health.

Maintaining or Making a Change?

While that 30 minutes is great for maintaining your health, if you're looking to make a change to health or weight it may take more than that.

"The more activity you do, and specifically the more vigorous activity you do, the greater the impact on every system in your body, including the heart, pancreas, brain and your mental health," say Jonathon Fowles, professor of kinesiology at Acadia University in Wolfville, NS. "Three hundred minutes of exercise per week is better than 150, and there's no upper end."

The Caveat

"This research doesn't surprise me at all," Fowles says, adding that it underscores the importance of exercise overall. "But you don't want to go from nothing to vigorous exercise all at once" he says. "The extreme tactics you see on shows like

The GSI Wellness Fair was held on July 9th and 10th at ELCIC National Convention in Edmonton. Here's some member feedback from this event:

"Excellent idea to check people at gathering like this"

This was awesome!! Very informative, very professional & delightful "crew"/group. Thank you!"

"This was a quick, easy way to get a snapshot of how I'm doing. It was (relatively) painless and a lot of fun. I appreciated the one-on-one explanations and encouragement from the health professionals,"

"Very helpful info and will encourage me to make some good changes around! THANK YOU!"

"Very, very good idea to have this Wellness Fair"

"Please do this next time!"

"Thank You" to all those who participated and made this event such a success! "Congratulations" to our participation prize winners:

The Biggest Loser don't work in real life. You'll be more likely to stick with exercise, and reduce your chance of injury if you build up gradually over two months."

Also, be cautious not to fall into the trap of rewarding yourself with treats high in fat or sugar as a reward for exercising. It takes a lot more than half an hour of walking to justify the calories in a chocolate bar.

Nuts

Nuts such as walnuts, almonds and pecans are known to improve your cholesterol levels and may help to protect against blood clots and heart attack. Research shows they can also control your blood sugar, curb your appetite and help you manage your weight. In a study of more than 100,000 men and women, the results showed that those who regularly ate nuts lived longer and healthier lives.

GO NATURAL It's a whole lot healthier to eat nuts without those sugary or salty coatings.
